SNOW WHITE AND THE SEVEN DWARFS

Once upon a time, there was a kind king who had a beautiful wife. After some years, the queen passed away, and the king married again. The new queen was beautiful, proud, and a little cruel. In her chamber stood a mirror--one of its kind--that whispered truths no one else dared to speak. Every day she stood before it and asked, "Mirror, mirror on the wall, who is the fairest of them all?" The mirror always whispered, "You are, my Queen."

Years passed, and the king's daughter from his first queen grew into a lovely young woman. Her name was Snow White, and she became very beautiful—more beautiful than anyone else in the kingdom. One day, when the queen asked her mirror the same question, she received a different answer. "You are fair, my Queen," it said softly, "but Snow White is fairer still." The queen's heart burned with envy. She called for the royal guard. "Take her into the forest," she ordered. "You have two days. Bring me her heart."

That night, the guard led Snow White into the dark woods behind the kingdom. "You don't have to do this," she said softly. "If you kill me, she will reward you for a day and forget you forever. But if you let me live... I can make sure you never have to fear her again." The guard lowered his sword. "The queen will not spare me if I return empty-handed," he said.

A week later, the guard returned to the castle. His hands shook as he placed a small box before the queen. Inside, wrapped in leaves, was a heart -- crimson-bright, yet small, as if it had once beaten in a smaller chest. The queen smiled. Her mirror, once again, called her the fairest. And she melted into pride.

Years passed. The queen grew older, yet she stood in front of her mirror each morning. And each time, the mirror replied loudly, "You are the fairest of them all." Pride filled her heart, and she smiled, satisfied with its words, deaf to the sharp, cold tone of the mirror that had once whispered gently.

Far away, deep in the forest, a cottage stood quiet beneath the snow. Inside were seven tiny beds... or rather, six. The seventh had been empty for some time, ever since one of the dwarfs vanished without a trace. And on the wall beside the fireplace hung a mirror -- large and shining.

Each morning, Snow White stood before it, her lips curling into a smile as she whispered,
“Mirror, mirror on the wall...”
